Although I think the number of languages in the world will decrease, I don't at all agree with the premise that everyone will speak the same language any time soon—perhaps not ever. There are languages that are spoken by only a few hundred people, and these languages may disappear in the future. However, those that are spoken by millions of people are in no danger of disappearing. As computer translation software improves, people will be able to communicate easily without needing a shared language. If people ever leave earth and move to other planets among the stars, the divide that caused people to start speaking different languages in the first place will once again happen. As people move out of easy communication distance with one another, the language that people speak will divert and change until they become unable to understand one another because of the great differences. As for the effect, although I have heard claims that different languages lead to different ways of thinking and there are benefits to knowing many languages, I am not entirely convinced of this idea. Instead, I think the effects of people being able to easily understand and communicate with all other people can only lead to people across the world feeling more kinship and openness to one another. So while I do not think that major languages will disappear or that everyone will ever speak the same language, I do think technology will erase the language barriers between people and lead to greater world peace. 254words
