Sample answer: 答えを作る時の参考にして下さい。

_There are many reasons why car companies would want to make driver-less cars, but the primary reason is that almost all car accidents are directly caused by human error. _People often drive when they are distracted, tired or otherwise not in the best mind to be driving. This endangers not only them, but also others. They are prone to making mistakes and this could cause them to get into an accident, or perhaps someone else gets into an accident while trying to avoid hitting them: _Also, when road conditions are bad, people might not be able to react quickly enough or might react incorrectly to unfamiliar situations. For example, when it rains heavily the car's wheels might leave the ground due to a deep puddle or their car may start to spin due to the road being slippery. People often do not know how to react in such situations, but a computer should be able to react quicker and better than a human being. There are also issues caused by drivers not being able to communicate with each other. _This should mean that a road with only self-driving cars should be far faster, more efficient and safer than roads with cars driven by people who make very human mistakes. However, anyone who has worked with a computer knows that with slightly wrong instructions or information, computers will make much worse mistakes than people. So, a malfunctioning AI driver might be quite a bit more dangerous. _So while self-driving cars are being developed to make the roads safer and transportation better, I am worried that they might have exactly the opposite effect. 271words
