I think that people are far too concerned about violence in video games, and I do understand why, but I think people's concerns about it are unfounded. Every time there is new media, the stories tend to be quite violent. Early movies often contained quite a lot of violence and horror, the same was true of radio shows, cartoons, comic books and television programs and so on. But none were clearly linked to more violence. There are those who say that video games are different, that one acts through the character in the video game. Rather than simply being a passive witness to the violence in video games, one is an active participant. It may seem that frequent exposure to violence, and participation in it, would desensitize one to violence. And it may be worse that the violence depicted tends to be glamorized and lack realistic consequences. However, many studies have been done in order to show that violence in video games causes real violence and that just doesn't seem to be true. In fact, it seems that those who play violent video games tend to be less violent otherwise. Maybe being able to act out aggression in a fake, electronic form there is no need to act on those feelings in real life. So while I do understand the concern, I think efforts to reduce violence in video games may be counter-productive. People have always been violent and having an outlet where they can be violent without causing damage or harm is probably better than not having one. (255 words)
