_I don't agree because I believe both can contribute to imagination and language skills. Each has its advantages and disadvantages. _While it is true that reading a story requires a person to be able to imagine much of the setting and details of the characters, until they have seen something on which to base their ideas their ideas about it are likely to be limited in scope. It is difficult to imagine another country until one has seen one. _Of course, what movies show is limited to the movie maker's ability to replicate what they intend to create. There are some ideas that can't really be expressed very well through cinematics, whether because they would be too expensive to replicate or because the ideas are more mental than visual. In such cases, a book can describe things that can't really be shown. _As far as language skills go, the dialogue in books is almost always stilted by necessity. It never flows naturally and so doesn't serve as a good example of how people verbally communicate. Furthermore, while one is more likely to encounter new words in writing and maybe get a good idea how they are used, it is often the case that people don't really know how to pronounce the words properly when they want to use them. _This is why I think it is best to neither reject reading nor watching TV, but instead try to do a bit of both. 243words
