A / an, the and zero article 1

A	We usually use the when we talk about – Reminder → I1– I9 things which are unique; that is, there is only one of them (or one set of them):
Ť.	the world the sky the atmosphere the sun the ground
	the climate the horizon the human race the environment
3	the travel industry the Internet general geographical areas with the as in:
	the beach the town the sea(side) the land the country(side)
	(where 'the country' or 'the countryside' means 'the area where there are no towns')
н	the past the present the future
	Note, however, that some nouns like this can be used with zero article (i.e. no article) to refer to a concept in general:
	 Climate is one of the many factors involved in changing farming methods. (or The climate) These flowers grow best in sandy soil and sun. (= sunshine)
	 In autumn the temperature difference between land and sea decreases. (or the land and the sea)
	If we want to describe a particular instance of these we can use a / an. Compare:
	If we want to describe a particular instance of these we can use a / an . Compare: I could see the plane high up in the sky . and When I woke up there was a bright blue sky.
	What are your plans for the future? and
	She dreamt of a future where she could spend more time painting.
B	We can use the when we make generalisations about classes of things using singular countable nouns. (See also Unit 47A.) Compare the use of the and a / an in these sentences: The computer has revolutionised publishing. (this refers to computers in general) but not A computer has revolutionised publishing. (computers in general have done this, not an individual computer) The computer is an important research tool. and A computer is an important research tool. (this statement is true of both the general class and the individual item) As an alternative to the + singular countable noun we can use a plural countable noun to talk about a class of things: Computers are an important research tool. Note that if the is used with plural and uncountable nouns we refer to a specific thing or group: The computers have arrived. Where shall I put them? The music was wonderful. I could have listened to the orchestra all night. When we define something or say what is typical of a particular class of people or things, we generally use a / an rather than the: A corkscrew is a gadget for getting corks out of bottles. A garden is there to give you pleasure, not to be a constant worry.
C	Some nouns can be used uncountably when we talk about the whole substance or idea, but countably when we talk about an instance or more than one instance of it. When these nouns are used countably we can use a / an (and plurals). Compare:
